The One Aim Sheet

One aim, a hundred quiet days, a thank you first, four voices and an honest look at what fuels you. Five pages you can fill in tonight.

Pick one thing. Then keep showing up.

Pick one thing. Write it down.

Napoleon Hill called it a definite chief aim: one specific goal you can see clearly, instead of a dozen you half pursue.

With ADHD and several brands running at once, I know how easy it is to hold twelve goals and move none of them. So this page is deliberately small. One sentence. Read it every morning and every night, and put it somewhere you will see it.

MY ONE AIM, IN ONE SENTENCE

BY WHEN

WHAT IT LOOKS LIKE WHEN IT IS REAL (SOMETHING YOU COULD PHOTOGRAPH)

WHAT I AM NOT CHASING FOR NOW

1 NARROW IT DOWN

Here are all the goals I am carrying: (list them, messy is fine).
Help me choose the one that would make the others easier or unnecessary. Ask me three questions first. Then give me one sentence, with a date, that I can read every morning.
```

Get specific about what you want.

Discipline is quiet.

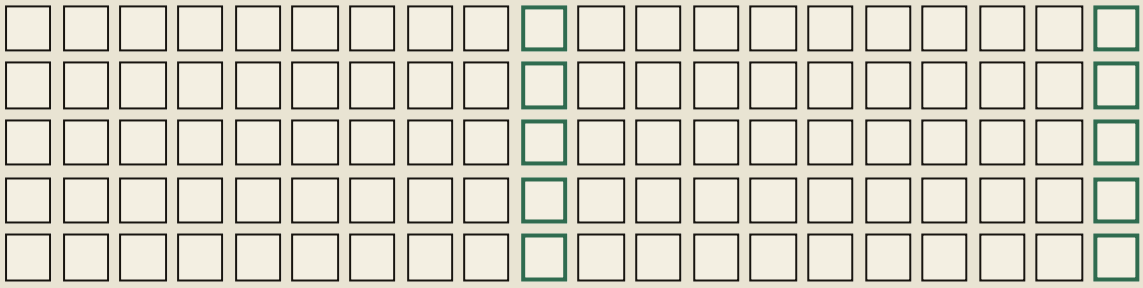

Nobody sees the hundred boring days. They only see the result and call it luck.

Pick one daily action that serves your aim, small enough to do on a day you feel nothing. Same time, same action. Colour one box for every day you do it. Do not wait to feel motivated, because motivation is loud and tends to leave exactly when you need it.

MY DAILY ACTION

SAME TIME, EVERY DAY

DAY 1 TO 100. ONE BOX A DAY.

The bad day rule

If the day goes wrong, do the smallest version of the action. Five minutes counts. Skipping twice in a row is what to avoid.

Let AI hold the system

Ask it for a daily reminder, a weekly look-back and the smallest version of your action, so remembering is never the hard part.

When it goes wrong, start with thanks.

Take your focus off what you lost and put it on gratitude. It can give you your power back.

Setbacks arrive on the way to any aim. The public example people share is an athlete who suffered a serious injury and still began by saying thank you. You do not need a dramatic moment to practise this. Do it on a small bad day and it is easier on a big one.

1 Thank. Write three things that are still true and still yours. Not forced, just real.

2 Name what is in your control. Separate what happened from what you can still choose. Most of the pain sits in mixing the two.

3 Take one next step. One action, today, that moves toward your aim from where you now stand.

2 SORT THE SETBACK

Here is what just happened: (describe it plainly). Do not comfort me.
Split it into: what I cannot change, what is still in my control, and the single smallest next step toward my aim: (paste your aim). Keep it under 120 words.

MY THREE THANK YOUS TODAY

A reflection exercise, not medical or professional advice. If you are struggling, please talk to someone you trust.

Choose who gets a say.

Advice is free. Direction from the right people is worth a great deal. Fill each seat with a name, and give everyone else a polite nod.

The example	Someone who has built what you want. If they have not done it, they may not be able to teach it. Look for receipts, not opinions.
The anti-goal	Someone who failed in public and kept going. They have been knocked down by life and still got back up.
The truth teller	Someone who makes you uncomfortable and tells you what you need to hear. It can be love in disguise.
The unbiased	Someone who gains nothing from your success. They can name your blind spots when no one else will.

3 PREPARE THE ASK

My aim is: (paste it). I want to ask (name) for advice as my (example, anti-goal, truth teller or unbiased voice). Write a short, respectful message and three specific questions that make it easy for them to answer honestly. No flattery.

You do not have to like them. You only have to listen.

Know which type you are.

People who win big tend to run on one of three fuels. You need to know which is yours, and which one the person across from you is running on.

SPITE	The chip on the shoulder. Proving people wrong. Powerful, but it can burn you out. Aim it at the work, never at people.
NO OTHER CHOICE	Pure hunger. No safety net, no plan B. Clarity comes easily because there is only one road. Add rest on purpose.
REFUSES TO BE AVERAGE	Curiosity about the limit. Going to the very end of what you can do because you find it oddly fun. Protect this one with structure so it does not scatter.

MY MAIN FUEL TODAY

HOW I WILL AIM IT AT MY ONE SENTENCE

ONE PERSON I NEED TO UNDERSTAND BETTER, AND WHAT FUELS THEM

4 THE WEEKLY CHECK

My aim is: (paste it). This week I did: (list it). Tell me, in plain words, whether my days point at the aim, and name the one thing to drop. Be direct.

A working sheet to adapt, not a guarantee of any result. Outcomes depend on you, your market and many things outside your control.

One aim. Quiet days. Keep going.
