The Dread Kit

A five minute AI routine for the one task you keep thinking about and never do.

You are not lazy. The task just has no first step yet.

The task is not the hard part.

You can solve other people's complicated problems all day, and still leave one small task sitting for months. A renewal. A form. A call. You think about it every day, and that thinking is the expensive part.

The task usually has no first step. It is a vague, heavy shape. AI is very good at turning a vague heavy shape into one small, specific action you can finish in five minutes.

The usual loop

Remember it, feel bad, put it off, remember it again tomorrow.

The Dread Kit

Name it, shrink it, hand AI the boring part, do the first step now.

The relief comes from doing it, not from thinking about it.

Say what it actually is.

THE DREAD DUMP

These are the tasks I keep avoiding: [list them messily]. For each one, tell me what it really involves in plain steps, how long it would take if I just did it, and what is the worst realistic thing that happens if I wait another week. Be matter of fact and kind.

Most dreaded tasks turn out to be shorter than the dread. Seeing the real size is half the job.

Then pick one

PICK THE FIRST

From that list, pick the one that has a deadline or a cost attached, and the one that would feel lightest to clear. Tell me which to do first and why, in two sentences.

One step, five minutes.

THE FIRST STEP

I need to do this: [task]. Give me the very first physical step, something I can do in under five minutes, written as one sentence. Tell me exactly what to have in front of me before I start. Do not give me the whole plan.

THE BORING PART

Here is what the task needs: [paste the details]. Write the email, the form answers or the phone call script for me, in plain words, so all I have to do is check it and send.

Check anything AI writes before you send it, especially names, dates and numbers.

Renewals and repeats.

THE RENEWAL LIST

These are things that expire or need renewing: [list, with dates if I know them]. Put them in date order, tell me when to start each one, which is two weeks before it is due, and write the one line reminder I should put in my calendar.

THE MONTHLY SWEEP

Once a month I will paste what is open. Tell me which items have been open longest, which can be dropped, and which to do this week. Keep it to a short list.

WHEN I STALL

I have been staring at this for ten minutes: [task]. Ask me one question at a time until we find what is stopping me, then give me the smallest next move.

Three things, in order.

1. Right now: run the dread dump and pick one task.
2. In five minutes: run the first step prompt and do only that step.
3. Sunday: run the renewal list so the next one never sits for months.

You are not behind on one task. You are one small step from done.

Not legal or financial advice. Check official sources for deadlines, fees and requirements.

Excellent at hard problems. Allowed to need a first step for the easy one.
