The No-Willpower Content System

How to keep posting on the days you do not feel like it, by taking effort out of the loop.

Consistency is a system, not an effort.

Why effort runs out and systems do not.

The people who look consistent are rarely more disciplined than you. They have fewer decisions standing between them and the post.

Effort is a battery. It is full on a good Monday and empty by Thursday, and an ADHD brain can run it down faster than most. A system does not care how you feel. It has a fixed time, a fixed place, a fixed first step, and something that catches the work when your energy drops.

Effort says

Post every day. Come up with ideas fresh. Edit when you feel inspired. Try harder after a missed week.

A system says

Record in one block. Ideas come from a list. Editing has a slot. A missed week changes nothing about next week.

This guide gives you four parts. Capture, Batch, Queue, Review. Each one removes a decision. Together they mean a post goes out whether you felt like it or not.

Rule of the whole guide: never make a decision twice.

Capture. Batch. Queue. Review.

01 CAPTURE	One place for every idea. A note on your phone called Ideas. Anything that makes you say that is a video goes in, one line, the second it appears. You never sit down and invent a topic again.
02 BATCH	One block to make everything. Pick one ninety-minute window a week. You record, or ramble into AI, for the whole week at once. One setup, one version of you, no daily start-up cost.
03 QUEUE	A queue that feeds itself. Finished posts sit in a schedule with dates attached. The aim is always to be a week ahead, so one bad day cannot break the run.
04 REVIEW	Ten minutes, once a week. Look at which posts people watched to the end. Next week, make more of those. You are steering, not pushing.

Four parts, four decisions removed. That is the whole machine.

Start with Capture only, for one week. Add the next part when the first feels boring. Boring is the sign it is working.

The ninety-minute batch.

One block, once a week, set at a time that stays the same. Put it in the calendar like a meeting you cannot move.

1 Minutes 0 to 10: pick. Open the Ideas note and choose five. Do not think about quality. Choose the five you would be least bored saying out loud.

2 Minutes 10 to 20: shape. Paste the five into AI with the prompt on the next page. Get back a spoken outline for each, hook, three points, one line to end on.

3 Minutes 20 to 70: make. Record all five, back to back, same place, same light. If a take is rough, say the line again and keep going. Fix nothing yet.

4 Minutes 70 to 90: queue. Drop the files into the schedule, one per weekday, and write the caption with AI. Close the laptop. You are done until next week.

THE RULE FOR THE BLOCK

Nothing gets decided during the make phase. Deciding happens in the first twenty minutes. Making is only doing.

No batch day? Use two forty-five minute blocks instead. The shape is the same: pick, shape, make, queue.

Three prompts that do the thinking.

1 IDEAS TO OUTLINES

Here are five video ideas: [paste]. For each one, write a spoken outline I can read in under 60 seconds: a first line that opens with the problem, three short points, and one closing line. Use plain spoken English and short sentences. Do not add facts I did not give you. Ask me if an idea is unclear.

2 RAMBLE TO POST

I am going to ramble about a topic for two minutes. Do not summarise it. Find the single most interesting sentence I said and use it as the hook. Then give me a clean script that keeps my words as close as possible and cuts anything repeated. Keep it under 150 words.

3 CAPTION AND HASHTAGS

Here is the script of my video: [paste]. Write a caption of two short lines that makes someone want to watch it, and a call to action that asks for one comment. Give me three hashtag options. Keep it warm and direct, not salesy.

Edit every prompt until it sounds like you. The more it sounds like you, the less you will dread opening it.

The minimum week, and the check.

When the week falls apart

Run the minimum. One idea from the list, one ramble into prompt 2, one post. That is enough to keep the queue alive. A minimum week still counts as a week.

Weekly checklist

1. Capture: Ideas note has at least five lines in it.
2. Batch: the ninety-minute block is in the calendar.
3. Queue: posts are scheduled for the next seven days.
4. Review: ten minutes spent on which post held people the longest.

Do these four things for four weeks and the posting stops depending on you. That is the point. You are not trying to feel motivated. You are trying to build something that works when you are not.

Not medical advice. This is a working method that sits alongside whatever support you already use. Change it until it fits your life.

You were never inconsistent. You were missing the system.
