The Hand-Off List

Find the jobs that drain you, hand them to AI, and get your hours back for the work that gives you energy.

Not put on this earth to do the dishes. Not the taxes either.

The dishes are never the problem. The pile is.

For a lot of ADHD brains, the jobs that give no reward are the ones that can sit for weeks: the admin, the invoices, the inbox, the forms, the follow-ups.

Each one is small. Together they are heavy, and they sit between you and the work you are brilliant at. The usual advice is to learn a better system. That works for some people and it is exhausting for others, because building the system is itself one more job with no reward.

Old answer

Learn the planner, the app, the method. Then keep it running every day by willpower.

Hand-off answer

Describe the job once, in plain words, and let AI do the repeating. You stay the director.

This pack gives you a way to find the jobs worth handing off, five prompts to do it, and a weekly rhythm that keeps the pile from coming back. It is a starting point, so change the words until they sound like you.

You do not have to learn the system. You have to describe the job once.

Sort every job into three piles.

Write down everything you keep avoiding. Then give each job one of three labels.

KEEP	It gives you energy, or only you can do it. Creative direction, the final call on your brand, the conversation with a person who matters. This is where your hours should go.
HAND OFF	It repeats, it has steps, and it drains you. Inbox sorting, invoice chasing, meeting notes, first drafts, formatting, scheduling, research, filing. These go to AI.
DROP	Nobody would notice if it stopped. The report no one reads, the tidy-up of an old folder, the meeting that could have been a message. Cross it off without guilt.

Your ten, right now

Tip: if you cannot write the list, ramble it to an AI for a minute and ask it to sort what you said into Keep, Hand off and Drop.

Describe the job once.

1 THE AUDIT

Here is a messy list of everything I keep avoiding: [paste or talk it out]. Sort it into three groups: Keep (gives me energy or only I can do it), Hand off (repeats, has steps, drains me) and Drop (nobody would notice if it stopped). One line per job. Ask me if something is unclear. Do not add jobs I did not mention.

2 THE JOB DESCRIPTION

I want to hand off this job: [name it]. Interview me with five short questions, one at a time, to find out what done looks like, how often it happens, what you need from me, and what must never go wrong. Then write the result as a one-page standing brief I can paste into any future chat, in plain language.

3 THE FIRST DRAFT

Using the standing brief above, here is this week's input: [paste]. Give me a first draft of the finished job. Do not ask me questions unless something is missing that you cannot reasonably guess. After the draft, list the two decisions only I can make.

Why it works: the first time costs five minutes. Every time after that, you are only reacting to a draft, which is far easier than starting.

Keep it from piling up again.

4 THE INBOX SWEEP

Here are my unread messages: [paste]. Sort them into: Needs me today,
One-line reply, Can wait, Ignore. For the first two, draft a short, warm reply in plain language. Do not invent facts, dates or prices.
Flag anything you are unsure about.

5 THE FRIDAY CLEAR-OUT

Here is what is still open from this week: [paste]. For each item tell me: hand off to you, do myself, or drop. For anything you can do, do it now and show me the result. For anything I must do, give me the first step in one sentence, five minutes or less.

Three rules that make it stick

1. Hand off one job at a time. Do not rebuild your whole life this weekend. One job, done properly, then the next.

2. Always keep the standing brief. Save it somewhere you can find in ten seconds, so you are never explaining a job twice.

3. Check the first three drafts, then relax. Trust it as it earns it, and stay the person who says yes, no or closer.

Your first week of hand-offs.

TODAY	Run prompt 1. Ten minutes, one messy list, three piles.
TOMORROW	Pick one Hand off job and run prompt 2. Save the standing brief.
MIDWEEK	Run prompt 3 on real input. React to the draft, edit it, send it.
FRIDAY	Run prompt 5. Close the week and choose the next job to hand off.

Where your hours go instead

Write one line for each hour you get back. Not a bigger to-do list. The thing that gives you energy, the project you keep postponing, the evening that is yours.

This is a working method, not medical advice. It sits alongside whatever support you already use. Check anything important that AI drafts, especially tax, legal or money matters, before you act on it.

You were never lazy. You were doing jobs that were never yours.
