The Thirty Day Dare

A month of acting like the founder you want to become, run by a system and an AI suit instead of willpower.

Belief starts it. A system finishes it.

Belief is the spark. Willpower is not the fuel.

Thirty days of acting like the version of you that already made it works, up to the point where your energy runs out. If your brain is wired for interest rather than routine, that point arrives fast.

So the dare has two halves. You hold a bigger belief about yourself, and you hand the daily carrying to AI, which does not get bored, tired or distracted. You stay in the director's chair.

You do

Decide, direct and approve. Set the bigger belief. Choose what matters each week.

AI does

Draft, sort, remind and prepare. It carries the work between your good hours.

You are the one in the suit. Not the one carrying the bricks.

Set the dare.

Pick three things to act on as if you were already there: a public thing, a money thing and a work thing.

PUBLIC	Post as if an audience of hundreds of thousands is watching. Same standards, same consistency.
MONEY	Price, quote and plan as if the business were already making the number you want.
WORK	Take the one project you keep calling "next" and make it this month's only priority.

SET IT UP

```
I am doing a thirty day dare. My public goal is [paste], my money goal is [paste], my work goal is [paste]. For each one, write what the version of me that has already achieved it would do this week, in three bullet points. Make every bullet something I can finish in under an hour.
```

One theme a week.

WEEK 1	Say it. State the goals publicly. One post, one message to someone who can help.
WEEK 2	Build the suit. Hand the repeating tasks to AI: drafts, summaries, follow ups, the daily plan.
WEEK 3	Act as if. Raise one standard: the price, the output, or the pace. Keep it for the week.
WEEK 4	Review and double. Look at what moved. Keep the habits that held, double the goal that felt too easy.

WEEKLY BRIEF

```
It is week [1 to 4] of my thirty day dare. Here are my three goals and what I did last week: [paste]. Give me this week's three actions, one per goal, each under an hour. Tell me one thing I can hand off to you completely. Keep it short.
```

Ten minutes, every day.

Systems over discipline: the day has a shape that does not depend on how you feel.

1 Morning, two minutes. Ask the AI for today's one action per goal. Read it. Do not add to it.

2 During the day. Do the actions in whatever order your energy chooses.

3 Evening, three minutes. Ramble what you did. Let the AI log it and show the running streak.

BAD DAY RESCUE

```
I have no energy and I have done nothing today. Here are my three goals: [paste]. Pick the smallest possible action, five minutes or less, that keeps the dare alive today. Do not motivate me, just give me the action.
```

A bad day only breaks the dare if you stop. Do the smallest action and move on.

The review.

On day thirty, read the whole month back in one go.

THE MONTHLY REVIEW

```
Here are my daily logs for the last thirty days: [paste]. Tell me:
what I completed, what I kept doing without being asked, where I slowed down and what was going on at the time, and what I did that I would not have done a month ago. Then suggest the next dare, bigger than this one.
```

1 Today: run the Set it up prompt.

2 Tomorrow: start the daily ten minutes.

3 Day thirty: run the review and set the next one.

A working routine to adapt. Not medical, legal or financial advice.

The version of you that you want to become is waiting for you to stop being reasonable.